Lipids and cellular immunity in asthmatic subjects. The ability of various lipoproteins to stimulate human lymphocytes in vitro has been examined in patients with various forms of atopic disease. Monocyte-derived wheal histamine release is increased by the low density lipoproteins. Lipoprotein B-100, in particular, is a potent stimulator of histamine release from monocytes in atopic and non-atopic subjects. The response is increased in subjects with atopic asthma and atopic eczema, although non-atopic asthmatics also show raised histamine release and have the highest monocyte monolayer release. The LDL also appears to be a stimulator of cells of the natural killer lymphocyte system. Non-atopic asthmatic subjects show raised natural killer activity and histamine release compared with healthy controls, but atopic asthmatic subjects show no difference in response to lipoprotein. The evidence suggests that lipoproteins and/or its components stimulate cells of the immune system in a manner analogous to that of immunological adjuvants. The responses are most likely due to production of compounds resembling endotoxins by atopic cells. The data indicate that atopy may be associated with raised monocyte histamine release and perhaps also with higher natural killer activity, but do not necessarily indicate any altered d0c515b9f4
