to manage a spa in Quito, Ecuador (CNN) The story of how cankerworms like this one fly so fast is one of biology's strangest tales.

Cankerworms speed around in circles, using their wings to get to their prey -- or to a mate -- and keep going until they run out of gas. The twist to their ultrafast flight is that they do so at speeds up to 87 meters per second -- roughly the same as the fastest human race car.

Now, almost two decades after the insect's discovery, a study published Tuesday in the journal Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences provides the most detailed molecular explanation yet for how this insect powers such blistering speeds. The study found that the insect releases a gas from its spiracles, a type of airway that opens on the front of the insect's head. The gas -- a compound that's produced by some other species of insect and was found to have unknown physiological roles in the new study -- breaks down chemical bonds to form a liquid that fuels the insect's flight. "What we found was just more of the same story," said study co-author Christopher Tyler, an entomologist at St. Louis University and a member of the Canker Worm Research Consortium. "I think this paper is the single most complete 6d1f23a050
